Changing up your running shoes, continued

Begin with running just a few miles once or twice a week on easy or recovery runs and then increase the distance very slowly from there over many weeks. At the same time, incorporating minimalist running and running specific lower leg/foot strength exercises can be very helpful.

It will be normal to have some soreness that you haven't experienced before after runs in a new style of shoe that you are not accustomed to over the first few runs. Don't mistake this as pain or injury unless the signs of injury are present during your run. Changing your shoes truly does engage different muscles.

Eventually, find the best rotation in your training that works for you. Most runners will likely find that a more supportive shoe will be their main choice for long runs and about half of their efforts, while a more minimalist type and/or lighter shoe will be their choice for racing, track workouts or tempo runs.

Remember to be open-minded and brand agnostic when shopping for shoes and find what works best for you!

If you have any ideas or suggestions for future topics or local runners of interest, please contact Spencer West at sdwest1102@yahoo.com or message him on Facebook.
